Viruses isolated from the sera of dogs in Mongolia were examined for genetic diversity. Fourteen isolates obtained between 1970 and 1994 were distributed into six subgenotypes of which "Amur" type was the most prevalent, named after the type of a vaccine strain. Amino acid sequences of the large protein (L), nucleoprotein (N)

sequences of the large protein (L), nucleoprotein (N) and phosphoprotein (P) of the 14 Mongolian isolates were compared with those of reference strains, and showed considerable variation in the N and P genes. The most variable region in the N gene was found in the carboxy terminal half, in which diversity among the dog isolates and strains was previously found to be inversely proportional to the degree of DNA conservation. In the P gene, differences between amino acid sequences of the Mongolian and reference strains were found in the hydrophilic part. These regions, as well as neutralizing epitopes of 6d1f23a050
